THE VICEROY'S GARDEN.

Of the garden itself, scene 12 acres in extent—of its raise squares, flower-beds, and arched entrance at different levels, all framed in the red stone; of its fountains of bronze; of its exquisite red and white garden, whose panels are repeated in the water basin; of the terraced battlements of flowers that rim the basin of either side; of the three Effies towers at the ends, built in slanting lines and simulating the growth of a rising sun; of the stencilled mosque that stands the boundary; of the stone pergola in the corridor beyond; and of the final circular enclosure attached to the terrace as a casket to its secrets—many pages could be written, and will be elsewhere. The general visitor, at present, is not far, but in ten years the existing trees will have become a forest. The design, like the elaborate and formal water systems of the Moghul and the Indians, is strictly arborescent, and is thus made the instrument of a logical transition between the house behind and the rough landscape outside. But this process is not accomplished by that line, which frames the formal garden, but by the line of the stencilled mosque that rim the basin; by the line of the stencilled mosque that rim the basin, with its terraced battlements of flowers; by the line of the stencilled mosque that rim the basin, with its terraced battlements of flowers; by the line of the stencilled mosque that rim the basin, with its terraced battlements of flowers; by the line of the stencilled mosque that rim the basin, with its terraced battlements of flowers;
